Who is Exempt from Workers' Comp in Florida?

In Florida, not all businesses are required to carry workers' compensation insurance. Certain exemptions apply to specific types of businesses or individuals, such as sole proprietors, partners, and corporate officers. For instance, a business owner who is the sole employee of their company may be exempt from carrying workers' comp insurance. However, if the business has employees, the owner may still be required to purchase coverage.

Understanding the Types of Exemptions

There are several types of exemptions in Florida, including those for agricultural workers, domestic workers, and independent contractors. It's essential to understand the specific requirements and qualifications for each exemption category to ensure compliance. For example, agricultural workers may be exempt from workers' comp coverage if they work for an employer who has fewer than six full-time employees. On the other hand, domestic workers, such as housekeepers or nannies, may be exempt if they work for a private household.
